

Deneille R. Walters is an Education Design & Technology Consultant based in Toronto, ON, whose interest lies in constructing digital environments for social learning and collaborative development. Since 2015, she has used a human-centered approach to produce programs that address learning needs of diverse audiences. In her previous work as Manager of Program & Education Design at Small Economy Works, she led a team in designing and developing entrepreneurial leadership, future of work, and digital skills training for Indigenous youth in Canada's Arctic. Through this work she has come to see and advocate for the use of arts and culture in education, as a method of helping youth build the confidence to express their creativity, whether it be through artistic endeavours or launching initiatives for their local community development. Deneille received her Master of Information from the University of Toronto.
